If you're a first-time installer, there's no need to fear — the process is easy and straight-forward. It'll take some time, but your computer will be radically faster when you're done! If your old storage drive is 128GB (for example) and you copy its contents to a 256GB SSD, the SSD may show up in your system as a 128GB drive, even though it's actually the size that you bought. No need to fear — you can still store more on it, but you'll need to make some adjustments to the drive's settings. This doesn't usually happen, but if it does, we want to let you know that it's OK and that it's based on your system, not you. If you're a first-time installer, there's no need to fear — the process is easy and straight-forward. It'll take some time, but your computer will be radically faster when you're done! Use the USB-C cable that came with the portable SSD to connect the X8 or X6 to the USB port. If you have a USB-A port instead, connect the USB-A adapter to the cable and use it instead. Once plugged in, your PC or Mac will recognize the X8 or X6 as a storage device. If you are running Windows 10, 8.1, or 7, open "My Computer." "Crucial X8" or "Crucial X6" will appear as a save destination. If you are running MacOS, use the Finder function to access the SSD, which will appear as "Crucial X8" or as "Crucial X6." In either case, the portable SSD will be available to assign as a destination to drag and drop files or to assign as a save destination. Partitioning your SSD will enable you to create sections within the drive as separate save destinations. For example, you can partition your drive to create a backup drive and a separate read/write drive. For more details, go to "How to Partition an External SSD. You'll need your Crucial SSD, a screwdriver, your computer's owner's manual (which will specify the type of screwdriver you need), and a SATA-to-USB cable (sold separately). If you have a Mac® system, see our Helpful Tip below for additional instructions.
